The Squeeze on Living Standards

- Even though the UK economy is picking up, the unprecedented squeeze on living standards continues. Real wages are down 1-2% YoY and have now been falling for 5-6 years. The decline in real wages is partly a side-effect of the long period of economic weakness, but has been exacerbated by gains in import prices and higher prices for energy and utilities (driven mainly by global costs, taxes and government surcharges). In addition, with buoyant labour supply and the flexible labour market, the inevitable squeeze on labour costs has come through more via a decline in real wages than via persistent declines in employment.
- We suspect that real wages will continue to fall in YoY terms in H2 this year, and probably also in 2014. Investment is at a record low as a share of GDP, capping future productivity gains. Labour supply remains ample, with high unemployment and, attracted by the UK's relatively high wage levels, sizeable inflows of foreign workers. The government may act later this year to cap some regulatory or tax-driven price hikes, but has limited fiscal space to do much. We expect that the decline in real wages will not prevent the economy picking up, with recovery driven more by housebuilding, exports and lower savings than by real wage gains. But, to some people, it may not feel like much of a recovery for a while.

Real wages continue to fall...

Even though the UK economy is picking up, the unprecedented squeeze on living standards continues. Underlying average earnings growth, at 1.0% YoY in May-July, remains well below CPI inflation (2.8% YoY over the same period), leaving underlying earnings down by 1.8% YoY. Real earnings growth has been consistently negative since mid-08, with a total decline of 6.6% over the last six years (ie average decline of 1.1% YoY). By contrast, over the prior 10 years (ie the 10 years ended July-07), real earnings grew by 28%, an average gain of 2.5% YoY. Other measures tell a similar dismal story.

...and the extended decline in real wages in recent years is without precedent over recent decades

- Real wages and salaries per hour<sup>1</sup> have fallen by 0.9% over the last year (even with the erratic tax-driven Q2 jump in bonus payments), and are down by a total of 7.9% since Q4-07 (with declines in 2008, 2010, 2011 and 2012). By contrast, real wages per hour rose by an average of 2.6% YoY over the prior 30 years. Such a long period of persistent declines in real wages is without precedent over recent decades. Indeed, before the recent period, the only full years with falling real wages since data began in 1971 were 1976 and 1977, along with minor declines of 0.1% YoY in both 1984 and 1995.
- Real personal disposable income per head in Q2 was 2.0% below the mid-07 level, whereas over the prior 10 years, real incomes rose by an average of 2.4% YoY. Again, this is the first time since data began in 1955 that real income per head has fallen over a 5-year period.
- Average household income fell 3.0% YoY in nominal terms in 2011/12, the first YoY decline since data began in 1977.

The erosion of real wages is largely an inevitable by-product of the long period of economic weakness...

The unprecedented and sustained decline in real wages is partly an inevitable reflection of the unprecedented and sustained weakness in the economy over recent years. This has been the weakest recession/recovery cycle in terms of GDP in recent decades, with real GDP per head still 7.1% below the 2007 peak. Indeed, the decline in real household disposable income (RHDI) actually has been quite modest relative to the decline in GDP. Real wages have fallen sharply but disposable incomes have been cushioned to an extent by the rise in the fiscal deficit, although this may be of only limited comfort to many consumers.

...but has been exacerbated by other factors

However, these cyclical effects do not tell the whole story. Real wage growth already began to slow sharply in 2005-06, before the financial crisis hit, and cyclical effects have been reinforced by three other trends.

The pre-crisis growth in real wages benefited from an extraordinary decline in prices of imported consumer goods

First, the pre-crisis growth in real wages was in part a symptom of the economy's unsustainable imbalances (worsening current account, high pound and credit-driven boom. From Jan-97 to Jan-08, the high pound and shift to importing from low-cost countries caused core consumer goods prices (ex food, drink, tobacco and energy) to fall by a total of 20%, whereas prices rose by 8% in the euro area over that period. This decline reflected a windfall gain for UK real incomes. In recent years, with the weak pound and rising global costs, this consumer windfall has ended. UK core consumer goods prices have risen by an average of 3% over the last five years, matching the trend in the euro area.

Note: Data for 2013 is H12 only.
Sources: Eurostat and Citi Research

The UK has relatively rapid rises in prices of utilities and other regulated items

Second, inflation in recent years has been further lifted by large gains in indirect taxes, energy prices, utility prices and other semi-regulated prices (eg electricity, gas, water, rail fares, university tuition fees). These items have persistently added about 1% to YoY CPI since mid-2006, with a similar effect at present, hence eroding real incomes by a similar amount. By contrast, price rises for these items were typically far more modest in the pre-crisis period, with these items adding only 0.4% per year to the CPI over 2001-05. The faster gains in recent years reflect a mix of higher global costs (eg for fuel), indirect tax hikes and regulatory-driven price hikes designed to finance extra investment and reduced subsidies. This effect has been more pronounced in the UK than most EU countries.

Compared to prior cycles, the squeeze on labour costs has come more through lower real wages than through a drop in hours worked

Third, while the above factors have caused an inevitable decline in aggregate real incomes, this has been reflected in an unusually large drop in real wages per hour (and real average earnings) rather than a sharp decline in employment and hours worked. Real pay has been unusually flexible, reflecting the combination of high unemployment and strong labour supply growth, driven by inflows of foreign workers, rising participation rates in the UK (particularly among the over-50s, mothers with young children) and people previously on long-term sickness and disability benefits. These groups have been unusually keen to seek work even if it means taking a squeeze on pay or less secure forms of employment. In aggregate, a large number of people have priced themselves into work. Hence, compared with previous cycles, real wages per hour have been relatively weak, while employment and total hours worked have held up quite well. Of course, the corollary of all this has been unusual weakness in productivity.

The squeeze on living standards has been compounded by worse credit availability and weaker house price gains

In the pre-crisis period, some people may have tapped home equity wealth and easy credit availability to support spending despite constraints from weakness in real wages. That lifeline has been less available in recent years, with lower LTV ratios on mortgages and high interest rates on overdrafts and unsecured loans, hence compounding the erosion of living standards.

We expect that real wages will continue to fall in H2 this year and perhaps again fall slightly in 2014

We expect that real wages for those in work (measured by average earnings ex bonuses less CPI inflation, or real wages and salaries per hour) will continue to fall in H2 this year and perhaps also fall slightly in 2014. The labour market still has plenty of slack, with the relatively high jobless rate, uptrend in the participation rate and inflows of foreign workers. The level of pay in the UK is among the highest in the EU, and the UK remains very open to foreign workers, with full labour mobility within the EU and sizeable inflows of non-EU workers as well. Further fiscal restraint lies ahead over time, capping incomes via public sector job cuts, wage restraint and benefit curbs. The previous windfall to real incomes from falling consumer goods prices is unlikely to repeat, given the lower pound and (with gains in Asian labour costs) reduced global deflationary impulses. The Chancellor recently hinted that he will address the rises in regulated prices later this year (most likely in the Autumn Statement), but — given that many regulated price hikes are used to finance investment or cut subsidies — we suspect that he will seek merely to slow price increases rather than to reverse them.

Sources: ONS and Citi Research

Weakness in real wages is unlikely to prevent the economy continuing to recover

We expect that weakness in real wages will limit, but probably not prevent, the economic recovery, which initially is likely to be driven by housebuilding, exports, plus gains in consumer spending financed from lower household savings and growth in employment rather than expansion in real wages. This mix is very different from the recoveries of the early 1980s and early 1990s, when real wages for those in work generally continued to grow even while unemployment was very high. Compared with those cycles, the current mix in effect trades off declines in real wages for higher employment and a lower jobless rate.

Even when real wages start to rise, we suspect that progress will be modest compared to the pre-crisis norm

We do expect that real wages will pick up further ahead, as the jobless rate falls, investment recovers and productivity picks up. But, with the factors discussed above, the UK probably faces a long period during which real wage growth remains low compared with the pre-crisis norm of about 2½% YoY. Investment fell to just 13.4% of GDP in Q2, down from 18.2% of GDP in Q1-08 and the lowest since data began in 1955. Business investment accounts for just 7.2% of GDP, also a record low (data go back to 1965). Such low investment implies meagre capital stock growth and, over time, weak growth in labour productivity and hence reduced scope for rapid real wage gains. It also is possible that the UK will replay the US experience of recent decades in which real income gains are concentrated towards the top end of the income distribution, so that the growth of median (ie middle) incomes lags the economy for an extended period<sup>2</sup>.

There are no lasting short-cuts to producing higher real wage gains, but we would emphasise measures to lift investment and innovation

One can imagine policies that superficially appear aimed at lifting real wages near term, but in practice would probably have large adverse side-effects. For example, restrictions on labour supply (eg higher minimum wage, limits on employment of foreign workers, earlier retirement ages, more generous benefits for long-term sickness and disability) might well reduce labour market slack and lift real wages for those in work. But they would do so by reducing the numbers in work. A sharp appreciation in sterling would probably cut prices of imported consumer goods, but would also hit exports. Similarly, cuts to regulated prices would, unless replaced by alternative subsidies, probably reduce the investment that regulated price hikes are meant to finance. Better solutions, on our view, would be measures to lift productivity through higher business investment — for example, better SME credit availability plus a strong focus on encouraging globally mobile firms to invest in the UK (eg low corporate tax rate, more generous capital allowances, reduced discussion about possible EU exit).

<sup>2</sup> This does not seem to have been in a major way the case so far. The ONS report that over the last five years, both mean and median hourly earnings of all employees rose by 11%. The ONS also report that over the last ten years, incomes of the bottom 20% of the income distribution have risen by 20% in nominal terms, whereas incomes have fallen slightly for the top quintile. See "The Effects of Taxes and Benefits on Household Income", 2011/12, ONS, July 2013.

Pursuant to Comissão de Valores Mobiliários Rule 483, Citi is required to disclose whether a Citi related company or business has a commercial relationship with the subject company. Considering that Citi operates multiple businesses in more than 100 countries around the world, it is likely that Citi has a commercial relationship with the subject company.

Many European regulators require that a firm must establish, implement and make available a policy for managing conflicts of interest arising as a result of publication or distribution of investment research. The policy applicable to Citi Research's Products can be found at https://www.citivelocity.com/cvr/eppublic/citi\_research\_disclosures.

Compensation of equity research analysts is determined by equity research management and Citigroup's senior management and is not linked to specific transactions or recommendations.

The Product may have been distributed simultaneously, in multiple formats, to the Firm's worldwide institutional and retail customers. The Product is not to be construed as providing investment services in any jurisdiction where the provision of such services would not be permitted.

Subject to the nature and contents of the Product, the investments described therein are subject to fluctuations in price and/or value and investors may get back less than originally invested. Certain high-volatility investments can be subject to sudden and large falls in value that could equal or exceed the amount invested. Certain investments contained in the Product may have tax implications for private customers whereby levels and basis of taxation may be subject to change. If in doubt, investors should seek advice from a tax adviser. The Product does not purport to identify the nature of the specific market or other risks associated with a particular transaction. Advice in the Product is general and should not be construed as personal advice given it has been prepared without taking account of the objectives, financial situation or needs of any particular investor. Accordingly, investors should, before acting on the advice, consider the appropriateness of the advice, having regard to their objectives, financial situation and needs. Prior to acquiring any financial product, it is the client's responsibility to obtain the relevant offer document for the product and consider it before making a decision as to whether to purchase the product. With the exception of our product that is made available only to Qualified Institutional Buyers (QIBs) and other product that is made available through other distribution channels only to certain categories of clients to satisfy legal or regulatory requirements, Citi Research concurrently disseminates its research via proprietary and non-proprietary electronic distribution platforms. Periodically, individual Citi Research analysts may also opt to circulate research posted on such platforms to one or more clients by email. Such email distribution is discretionary and is done only after the research has been disseminated via the aforementioned distribution channels. Citi Research simultaneously distributes product that is limited to QIBs only through email distribution.

The level and types of services provided by Citi Research analysts to clients may vary depending on various factors such as the client's individual preferences as to the frequency and manner of receiving communications from analysts, the client's risk profile and investment focus and perspective (e.g. market-wide, sector specific, long term, short-term etc.), the size and scope of the overall client relationship with Citi and legal and regulatory constraints. Citi Research product may source data from dataCentral. dataCentral is a Citi Research proprietary database, which includes Citi estimates, data from company reports and feeds from Reuters and Datastream.
