

Short-End Notes

Fed purchases likely to drive repo lower

- Purchases pressure short-rates — With no surprises from the FOMC, QE purchases should continue to pressure short-term rates lower over the remainder of the year.
- Reserve / Deposit ratio drives repo — The ratio of the supply of Fed liabilities (including reserves) to the demand for cash-like instruments (including demand deposits) has a tighter relationship with repo rates than the level of reserves alone. Based on the historical relationship between repo rates and the ratio, Treasury repo should be around 16bp today and fall to 10bp by year end.
- Front-end pricing tail risks — The very front end of the interest rate curve reacted dramatically to the bank bail-in proposal in Cyprus with 2y swap spreads about 4bp wider on the week. This move seems large as compared to the relative calm in markets for financial CP and cross-currency swaps. Nevertheless, if investors believe tail risk from Europe has risen forward rates may continue to embed a higher risk premium.

Citi Research is a division of Citigroup Global Markets Inc. (the "Firm"), which does and seeks to do business with companies covered in its research reports. Investors should consider this report as only a single factor in making their investment decision.

Fed purchases likely to drive repo lower

Wednesday's FOMC statement and press conference were in line with market expectations, and Citi's economists continue to expect the $85 billion a month in QE purchases to continue with some tapering in 2H 2013 as the economic recovery gathers steam. As we explain below, the empirical relationship between repo rates, reserves held at the Fed and the demand for cash-like instruments suggests that Treasury GC repo may move as low as 10bp by year end.

To understand the relationship between repo rates and Fed reserves it's helpful to review the mechanics of reserve creation. When the Fed purchases a Treasury security from a bank, it adds the Treasury to its stock of assets and adds new reserves to the bank's Federal Reserve account. In this way the asset side of the Fed's balance sheet, mainly Treasuries and Agency MBS, stays in balance with the liability side, mainly reserves and currency.

Source: Citi Research, Federal Reserve

Pre-crisis the Fed did not pay interest on excess reserves and banks were incentivized to lend out their excess reserves to earn a positive yield. A bank might make a loan to an individual who would keep some currency and redeposit the rest in a bank that would make a loan to another individual and so forth until through the textbook money multiplier effect deposits reached a multiple of the initial reserve base (Figure 1) and most of the Fed's liabilities were in the form of currency rather than reserves. (Figure 2)

With the Fed paying interest on excess reserves and opportunities to productively lend money limited, a large fraction of the Fed's liabilities are now reserves, rather than currency. (Figure 2) As the Fed increases the level of reserves through QE it is effectively increasing the supply of cash-like instruments which puts downward pressure on short-term lending rates. However, since the economy is growing on average the amount of currency and demand deposits that individuals want to hold grows as well, putting upward pressure on short-term rates. (Figure 3)

Source: Citi Research, Federal Reserve

By this logic, it is not just the level of reserves that should impact repo rates, but rather the level of reserves relative to the desire to hold currency and cash-like deposits. The data bears this out with repo rates about 2.8bp lower for every .1 increase in the ratio between reserves and deposits<sup>1</sup>. Even as reserves stayed roughly constant in summer 2011, the ratio decreased (Figure 4) and repo rates increased as individuals, concerned by the European debt crisis and the US debt ceiling, sought to hold more cash-like instruments.

Since deposits have been growing at a fairly stable pace and Fed purchases are likely to remain unchanged, we can forecast both the numerator and denominator of the ratio. The historical relationship implies that Treasury GC repo should be close to 16bp today, 12bp by the end of Q2 and 10bp by the end of the year. (Figure 5) These estimates are somewhat higher than what would be implied by a regression on the level of reserves alone. While the point estimates look reasonable, the path of repo rates will be less smooth than the forecast and we continue to expect that repo will move sharply lower to sub 15bp territory when cash management bills mature in mid to late April.

Source: Citi Research, Bloomberg

Cyprus bank situation increases front end tail-risk

When 3m USD LIBOR reached our 28bp target in February we stated that the risks were tilted toward higher LIBOR, but that LIBOR was unlikely to gap higher due to the relatively tight range of submissions. While the 3m LIBOR fixing increased less than .5bp this week, mainly driven by UK and US names, 2y swap spreads widened about 4bp and front-end Eurodollar contracts are pricing LIBOR at 37.5bp by September. These moves seem large relative to those in the EUR-USD cross-currency basis, which is at a similar level to just post the Italian election. Also, financial CP has continued to trade well. While the move in forward LIBOR markets looks overdone relative to other market variables, it's not clear that it needs to be fully retraced as even if Cyprus is contained, as our economists expect, tail risk from Europe has risen which should lead investors to demand a higher risk premium.

<sup>1</sup> This ratio is similar to the St. Louis Federal Reserve's m1 money multiplier which is the ratio of M1 (currency plus demand deposits, other checkable deposits and traveler's checks) to base money (currency plus reserves). We focus on the ratio between deposits and reserves since this is the component that drives moves in m1 in the current environment.
