

China Macro Flash

Feb Trade Data: Weak Demand Pushes Trade Surplus to New High

- Trade surplus supportive to GDP growth in 1H – China's trade surplus in Feb achieved US$60.6bn after the monthly reading in Jan hit the US$60bn mark for the first time in history. This shrugs off the Chinese New Year effect, which cut the working days short from 21 in Jan to 17 in Feb. The surplus in Jan-Feb (US$120.7bn) this year is already 17% larger than its sum of 1H (US$102.5bn) last year. The surging trade surplus is driven by both weak domestic demand and falling commodity prices, which may persist at least in 1H this year. In the near term, recessionary surplus should partly offset the downside of weak investment growth, ease the flood of capital outflows and thus avoid sharp RMB depreciation.
- Imports weakened more on weak demand, less on low commodity prices – The Feb import growth came much weaker than market expectation, -20.5% yoy vs. 10% yoy. The Jan-Feb imports were also down by 20.2% from a year ago, and the level of contraction has not been seen since early 2009. Recent data suggests that weak domestic demand might have outpaced falling commodity prices in pulling down import growth. The import quantum index declined from 107.3 in Oct to 88.8 in Jan, down by 18.5 pts, but meanwhile, the price index (i.e., unit value) lost 7 pts from 97.4 to 90.4. Weak domestic demand is linked to weak external demand as the export quantum index fell off 109.5 to 96.5 during the same period of time.
- Export growth jumps up to double digits in Jan-Feb, more volatility ahead – The monthly data again had shown a big swing with export growth skyrocketed to 48.3% yoy in Feb, far above market consensus of 14% yoy and our expectation of 16% yoy. This was partly due to the low base of exports last year. For example, exports in Feb 2014 were only 54.9% of the level in Dec 2013, far below the averaged 72.8% between 2000 and 2013. Nevertheless, the Jan-Feb exports grew 15% yoy, almost the best level since Feb 2013. However, as the PMI export order index stayed weak in the past few months, it may imply more volatility in export growth in the near term.
- Weak euro hasn't hurt exports to EU yet – China's export growth to Japan was flat in 2013 and 2014, and recorded another -4.4% yoy in Jan-Feb due to political complication between these two countries and also weaker yen. The RMB has appreciated against euro by 7.1% YTD, but exports to EU accelerated from 9.7% in 2014 to 12.6% yoy in Jan-Feb while exports to ASEAN and the US recorded much stronger growth, 38.2% and 21%, respectively. Falling prices haven't lifted China's demand for key commodities. The import volume growth for crude oil slowed from 13.4% yoy in Dec to 4.5% yoy in Jan-Feb, and for iron ore from 18.4% yoy to -0.9% yoy. Imports volume of intermediate goods also slowed from 39.1% yoy to 15.4% yoy for machine tools, from 25.6% yoy to 11.4% yoy for electronic integrated circuit, and from 7% yoy to -18.8% yoy for automobiles and chassis.
